“OH, he’ll kill me, he’ll kill me!” quivered Randy Rabbit as he loped through the wild grasses of Leafy Forest. “He shall catch me and eat me!”

Poor Randy Rabbit was as frightened as he could possibly be, and with very good reason. For Fleet the Fox was after him! Every time that Randy threw a quick look back, he could see the fox’s cruel face, with its glistening, narrow eyes and hungry red tongue, coming closer and closer!

“It’s no use runnin’, rabbit!” Fleet called. “I’ll catch up with you! You’re going to be my dinner. I can run faster than you because I’m bigger and stronger!”

Randy Rabbit knew that the fox was right. Already, he could tell that his own strength was failing fast and that he couldn’t run much further. A feeling of desperation came over him and he shut his eyes tight.

“Oh, moon,” he said to the Man in the Moon, who was looking down on Leafy Forest, “this is my last wish! Let me be bigger and stronger than Fleet the Fox . . . for just a minute!”

The Man in the Moon winked, and suddenly, Randy felt himself changing. His fur was becoming shaggy and brown, he seemed to be growing ever so much bigger and his teeth felt very strong and sharp.

“Why . . . why . . . I’ve changed into a bear!” said Randy Rabbit. He stopped running and waited for Fleet the Fox to see him.

“Mercy!” gasped the fox. “You . . . you’re a bear!”

“Grrr!” Randy growled, to prove he was a bear. “Grrr!” And he stretched threatening paws out towards the fox. “I’m bigger and stronger than you, so you’re going to be my dinner!”

Fleet the Fox quivered and quaked with fear. He was so very frightened, that he could hardly stand up. He had never been so scared of anything in his life. “Oh, spare me,” he pleaded, tears streaming down his face, “and I’ll never hunt weaker animals again! At last I know how it is to be hunted! Please, spare me!”

“You are spared!” said the bear to the pleading fox. “You are free to go!”

As Fleet the Fox scampered off into the forest, Randy looked down at himself. “Why . . . why I’m a rabbit again!” he exclaimed, when he saw his own white fur. “I guess there really is magic, after all!”

And the Man in the Moon winked again!

Those JAIL-BIRD STRIPES

THE price of mules was terribly high—which was why Farmer Goat made his strange purchase. It was a tame zebra, who could do everything a mule could do—and his price was low because nobody seemed to want him!

The barnyard folk at Farmer Goat's farm didn't want him, either. He was different—they'd never seen anything like him before. So they scorned the company of poor Zip the Zebra, sneering at his unaccustomed stripes. It was a lonely life for Zip, but he made the best of it, longing for the day when he'd be accepted by the other animals, and welcomed as one of them.

But as time went on, they paid less attention to him than ever. Something far more important was occupying their interests. For Bruiser Bear, the killer, had recently escaped from jail, and was known to be hiding in Leafy Forest, which adjoined their farm. More than that, he was conducting a series of raids on the barnyard, each time seizing another victim to satisfy his savage appetite. Already Danny Duck had met his doom—and Packy Pig—and Chiquita Chicken! The police were powerless to find him. Small wonder, then, that the animals on Farmer Goat's farm were paralyzed with terror, for no one knew who'd be next!

It worried Zip Zebra too—the more so because he didn't even have the comfort of company. He was left severely to himself. Why, at that very moment, there he was in the pasture alone, with night falling—all for the reason that the other animals wouldn't let him return to the barn with them! No, they didn't like his ridiculous stripes, so he was forced to wait until they departed, then make his way homeward alone. His teeth chattered as he plodded toward the barn. It was awfully dark—and who knew but that Bruiser Bear might be about? His heart jumped at a slight sound—at the sight of a bulky figure creeping from behind a bush! It—it was Bruiser Bear himself!

Expecting a savage attack, Zip the Zebra instead received a jolting surprise. "Hiya, pal!" whispered the bear, who was attired in the striped convict suit in which he'd made his jail-break. "I wuz just gonna jump ya when I noticed those stripes—so I knew you wuz an escaped prisoner too! Woddeya say we join up, huh?"

Zip tried to stutter out an answer, but the big bear cut him short. "We're goin' ta Farmer Goat's barn," he growled, "and this time we'll make a real cleanup! With your back to load them dumb animals on, it'll be a cinch!"

So off they went, because poor Zip Zebra was too terror-stricken to offer an objection. Up to the barn door they crept. Zip knew that he couldn't do this, even to save his own life. True, the folk of the barnyard hadn't been nice to him—but could he contribute to their doom?

"Now!" snarled Bruiser Bear, as he flung the barn door open. And in that moment, Zip summoned his courage—and acted! "Hee-haw!" he brayed, startling the imperilled animals into wakefulness. The amazed bear wheeled toward him menacingly—just in time to receive Zip's flying hooves square in the chin! And down he went!

Bruiser was hauled off to jail, and as for Zip—well, things were different from then on! The animals of the barnyard hailed him as their savior, and you can be sure that never again was he lonely. And to this day, stripes are the most popular things around Farmer Goat's property!

A Lesson FOR CURLY

CURLY was a mischief-maker, no doubt about it! The little bright-eyed monkey loved to play pranks. Usually, his tricks were pretty harmless and funny, but lately, they had been getting rough.

"Oh, boy, this's fun!" Curly exclaimed, heaving a rock at a bird's nest. "Lookit 'er flutter! Wowee! Listen to 'er screech!"

Throwing rocks at the birds was Curly's latest idea of a good time. "I love ta see 'em shoot outta the nests!" he chortled. "Boy, ya'd think they had a hotfoot, the way they fly right up an' hafta leave the eggs unpertected! Whatta joke!"

The birds, however, didn't think much of Curly's joke. To them, it was no fun to be struck by a sharp rock.

"It hurts!" said one mother bird indignantly.

"He almost broke one of my hatching eggs," complained another.

"I've lost some tail feathers," wailed a third.

Things got so bad that all the birds decided to do something about the mischief-making monkey. "We'll teach him a lesson," they said, "and we'll do it together, for in union there is strength!"

The very next day, when Curly appeared with an armful of rocks, he was surprised to find no mother birds on their nests. "Wonder where they went to," he said, shading his eyes and looking up into the sky. "Oh, there they are!"

Sure enough, right above him was a formation of birds. Right above him!

"Hm, wonder what they're holding," Curly said.

All the birds seemed to be hanging on to some huge object and holding it 'way up in the air. Curly couldn't quite make out what it was.

"It looks like . . . like a . . . like . . ." he was starting to guess, when all the birds answered him at once.

"It's a rock!" they shouted, and let go of it.

Crash! Down it came, right on Curly's head! And down went Curly, with a million lights and stars dancing before his eyes!

It took a few hours for Curly to come to. He was still dazed and achey when he fluttered his eyes open, to see himself surrounded by all the birds.

"Well?" asked the mother bird who had lost some of her tail feathers.

"Well?" the rest of the birds echoed.

"I . . . gulp . . . guess I've learned my lesson," Curly admitted weakly. "I'll never throw rocks again!"
